residence. More than 1000 articles within Russian law regulated religious/communal life, economic activities, jobs, military service, property rights, and education. Jews were also required to pay special taxes that went beyond the taxes of all other Russians. These economic, social, and eventually violent physical repressions of Jews intensified during the reign of Alexander III (1881-1894) and Nicholas II (1894-1918).
